Courses Taught (syllabi available upon request):

Public Affairs 388K/History 381: Strategy and Decision-Making in Global Policy. This is a graduate course that I teach for professional students at the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs and Ph.D. students in the University of Texas Department of History, Department of Government, and the Middle Eastern Studies Department. The course examines theories and historical case studies in strategic decision-making, with the aim of improving our understanding and practice of organizational leadership.

History 381/Public Affairs 388K: International History since 1898. This is a graduate course that I teach for Ph.D. students in the University of Texas Department of History and professional students at the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs. Readings, discussions, and writing assignments require an intensive analysis of recent scholarship on international affairs since the late 19th century. The course nurtures methodological and historiographical expertise in international history and policy.

Public Affairs 388K/History 381: Universities and National Policy. This is a graduate course that I teach for professional students at the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs and Ph.D. students in the University of Texas Department of History. The course examines the history of higher education, including key institutions, ideas, and personalities. Readings and discussions interrogate the historical purposes of universities, their practices, and their influences on society. The course concludes with reflections on the current state of universities and their likely future development. Students write a forward-looking but historically-informed mission statement for a university in the twenty-first century.

Leadership, Strategy, and Decision-Making. This is a two-day intensive Executive Education course that I teach through the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs. This course offers public and private sector leaders an opportunity to improve their strategic thinking and implementation through an immersion in historical methods. The course uses historical case studies to improve participants' understanding of global change, organizational management, and the judgment necessary to think beyond the immediate pressures that monopolize most people's time. The goal of the course is to help leaders formulate and implement long-range plans for improving their organizations. Readings, lectures, and exercises apply analytical concepts and historical insights to the contemporary needs of enrolled participants.

History 315L: American History since 1865. This is a large undergraduate lecture course that I teach at the University of Texas at Austin. The course provides students with a broad understanding of social, political, economic, cultural, diplomatic, and military transformations in American society since the Civil War. The course emphasizes the development of critical skills for reading, writing, and interpretive analysis.

History 433: America and the World in the 18th and 19th Centuries. This is a large undergraduate lecture course that I teach each fall at the University of Wisconsin.

History 434: America and the World since 1900. This is a large undergraduate lecture course that I teach each spring at the University of Wisconsin.

History 600: The Sixties – Dissent and Détente in International Society. This is an advanced undergraduate reading, research, and writing seminar that I teach for history majors at the University of Wisconsin.

History 600: Empires and Foreign Intervention in the Twentieth Century. This is an advanced undergraduate reading, research, and writing seminar that I teach for history majors at the University of Wisconsin.

History 703: Comparative Imperialisms: The U.S. and Japan. This is a graduate (M.A. and Ph.D.) reading and writing seminar that I co-teach with my colleague, Louise Young, at the University of Wisconsin. The course seeks to analyze various theories of imperialism and the history of American and Japanese expansion since the late 19th century. The course aims to create a more rigorous understanding of imperialism as a historical concept, and examine its application in diverse chronological and geographical settings.

History 753: The Cold War as World Histories. This is a graduate (M.A. and Ph.D.) reading and writing seminar that I teach at the University of Wisconsin. The course seeks to internationalize the research and teaching of twentieth century history.

History 858: Afghanistan and the World: From the Great Game to the War on Terror. This is a graduate (M.A. and Ph.D.) reading and writing seminar that I co-teach (with Professor David Morgan) at the University of Wisconsin. The course combines an intensive focus on the history of Afghanistan since the eighteenth century with extensive analysis of broader changes in international relations, military affairs, and global economy. The course showcases how attention to the international history of a region can illuminate global trends and contemporary foreign policy challenges.

History 900: The Historian's Craft for U.S. Historians. This is a graduate (M.A. and Ph.D.) seminar designed to introduce first semester graduate students to the professional work of U.S. historians. The course includes readings in historiography, pedagogy, and issues of professionalization. The course also seeks to socialize graduate students into their new careers.

History 901: International History since 1815. This is a graduate (M.A. and Ph.D.) reading and writing seminar that I teach at the University of Wisconsin.

International Relations from the Renaissance to the Modern Era.

The Past and Future of the European Union.

These are undergraduate seminars that I taught in the joint University of Wisconsin-University of Michigan Overseas Study Program in Florence, Italy, Spring 2007. These courses integrated intensive reading and writing with attention to local Italian sources.

History of U.S. Grand Strategy. This is an online course offered in separate sections to undergraduate students and “special” graduate students, especially U.S. military officers. The course is a centerpiece of the Grand Strategy Program at the University of Wisconsin. The course is designed to provide students with historical background for thinking more effectively about contemporary global issues. It aims to train students – traditional and non-traditional – as global strategic thinkers. The online environment allows military officers, businesspeople, and others to participate actively in the course. See: <http://grandstrategy.wisc.edu/>.

The United States and the World: The History of American Foreign Relations since 1941. This is an online non-credit course that I have created, with the assistance of William Tishler. See: <http://www.uwalumni.com/suri>. A large international group of students participate in the course. They listen to recorded weekly lectures, read assigned materials, and communicate with the instructor and one another through online discussion and chat forums. This course is an ambitious and experimental endeavor to bring serious academic knowledge to a broad community. The course also seeks to nurture a wide-ranging and consistent intellectual discourse among diverse people.

International Strategy and Decision-Making. Two-day intensive course for Executive MBA students at the University of Wisconsin School of Business. This course introduces business executives to the modern history of international strategy and leadership. The course encourages MBA students to think more systematically about how they can formulate and implement better international strategies in business. The course interrogates the potential uses of historical analysis in business and government. The course also examines the concept of international political risk, and its potential applications by business strategists.

Turning Points in the Cold War. Co-directed with Professor Fredrik Logevall a week-long intensive summer institute for Ph.D. students in history from around the world. Co-organized and co-led discussions of key texts, research strategies, professional development, and research-in-progress with eighteen selected Ph.D. students. The institute was sponsored by the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations (SHAFR), with partnership from the Wisconsin Veterans Museum, the University of Wisconsin Center for World Affairs and the Global Economy, and the University of Wisconsin Department of History.

Faculty Development Seminar on International Governance. This is a special seminar for University of Wisconsin faculty, sponsored by the Center for the Humanities, that encourages interdisciplinary study of scholarship related to the definitions, dilemmas, and prospects of international governance in the contemporary world. I will co-direct this seminar with Professor Jonathan Zeitlin in Fall 2007.
